The National Security & Resilience Act

Universal, Zero-Premium Healthcare

The National Sovereignty and Resilience Act (NSRA) establishes the Basic Medical Provision (BMP), universal health coverage with zero premiums for every American, delivered through competitive private carriers and funded by the Health Security Fund.

What the Basic Medical Provision does

The BMP guarantees a zero-premium health plan to every American. Rather than replacing private insurance, it layers a universal floor beneath the existing system: private carriers compete to deliver the BMP, and anyone who wants additional coverage can still buy it. No one is forced off a plan they like.

How it is paid for

The BMP is funded by the Health Security Fund, which draws on the NSRA's enforcement-driven revenue streams, including pharmaceutical parity savings and offshore tax recovery, not income-tax increases on households under $400,000. The Congressional Budget Office scoring pathway is built into the statute.

Why it survives legal challenge

The healthcare titles are engineered for constitutional durability, with an 85% medical-loss-ratio floor and pre-deprivation due-process schedules calibrated to Mathews v. Eldridge. The mechanism is enforceable and administratively concrete.
